Elections define democracy. It is the one mechanism that symbolizes people's power, celebrates their participation in the political process and honours their choice with regard to the direction that a society should take. Elections, therefore is the acknowledgment that state power is beholden to the people.

Elections being the essence of modern democracy should hold sanctity to be truly meaningful. If reduced to a mere once-in five-years jamboree, elections serve only as a facade of democracy and nothing more. In its spirit and essence elections are meant to serve as an instrument in the hands of the masses to demand accountability of those that wield power. The one opportunity accorded to the people to choose individuals and policies that would govern their lives should act as a means of empowerment.

Making it just a formality that is exercised unthinkingly or, leaving it open to influence of money or muscle power can only corrupt the system and dilute the claims of accountability. Elections, therefore, do not, per se usher in democracy in the true sense, it is the spirit and manner in which the exercise is undertaken that makes all the difference.

It is widely acknowledged that it is the fair conduct of elections that is the key to true democracy, to the emancipation of the downtrodden and, to bringing about all round development. But, as with everything human, elections too, is susceptible to manipulation, subversion and fraudulent practices. When that happens, elections become just another way to perpetuate the hold that a set of influential people have on power. It no longer remains about the aspirations of the common people, of the dire needs of the marginalized and the unrealized potential of the youth.

The stark need to address the issue of corrupt practices in elections gained urgency during the recent general elections in India. Charges of buying votes by way of distribution of cash, influencing poorer voters through enticements like liquor and material gifts, misleading voters through fake news and massive propaganda, abuse of official resources and machinery for partisan objectives and, above all, of voting machines being tampered, few thick and fast but saw no worthwhile response from those entrusted with running the show.

Elections are the mainstay of democracy. It ensures - smooth transfer of power, representation of all sections of society in the government, public attention on all important matters, opportunity to choose between alternative viewpoints and policy initiatives and increased public awareness of pressing national issues.

All these very desirable political objectives can be realized only if the election machinery is independent of and immune to political influences and manipulation.

The Election Commission as an agency should be as free of executive control as it can be. The constitutional provisions that are meant to protect the independence of the Election Commission should not be diluted by arbitrary appointments, transfers and promotions. Only then can elections be free and fair, politics be a level playing field for all the parties, and democracy flourish.
