"It is not the strongest of the species that survives, nor the most intelligent, but the one more responsive to change."

—Charles Darwin

If there is one word that defines the 21st century, it has to be "adaptivity". The world led by the forces of globalization and digitisation is evolving at an incredibly fast pace. While globalisation has led to connectivity beyond physical boundaries, it is digitisation that has enabled this connectivity. These forces though have led to an increase in our collective competencies and economic opportunities but has led to more complexities and ambiguities. To be able to adapt to these rapidly changing times we must acquire the skills necessary to survive in a highly evolving world.

The 21st-century skills are the new building blocks for learning in today's world. They are universally applicable tools for improving ways of thinking, learning and working. Critical thinking, creativity, problem-solving, metacognition, collaboration, communication, and global citizenship are some of the important skills. In today's fast-paced world, literacy is no longer limited to one's ability to read and comprehend but encompasses skills that make them 21st-century ready. The integration of technology with our society has overturned the globe, technology is seen as the harbinger of the fourth industrial revolution. The growing reliance on technology has had its impact on the job market too, employers now seek candidates who show a higher "Digital Quotient."

This makes the case for Digital Literacy. As per UNESCO (2013), digital literacy can be viewed as an umbrella term that encompasses a range of meanings. It includes ability to use digital devices or software, to consume and produce digital content, and to participate in digital communities. The simple fact is that digital literacy is now required for living, learning, and working successfully.

Digital Literacy is no longer a luxury that is meant for only a few but a right that should be seen as an extension of the Right to Education which is a basic human right. In 2016, UNHRC articulated access to the internet as an essential human right. The Supreme Court in Anuradha Bhasin v Union of India (2020) recognised the Right to the Internet as a fundamental right. This expansion ensures that the constitutional provision are in tune with the technological innovation. Millions of Indian citizens rely on the internet as their primary source of information. The Hon'ble High Court of Kerala in Faheema Shirin RK v. State of Kerala (2019) case held that the Right to the Internet is a part of the Right to Education and Right to Privacy under Article 21A and Article 21 of the Constitution of India respectively. Internet access not only enhances the opportunities of students to acquire knowledge but also enhances the quality of education.

This comes at a time when the COVID-19 pandemic forced all of us into the virtual world and the need for digital literacy is being felt more than ever. But it raises a more pertinent question that whether Indians are skilled enough for the 21st-century world? As per National Sample Survey 2017-18, only about 38 per cent of India fits the definition of being digitally literate. Further, there is a rural-urban divide in terms of digital skills where 61 per cent of the urban population is digitally skilled as against 25 per cent of the rural population. While India is undergoing a digital revolution that has the potential to propel us forward in terms of economic growth and development, we also risk creating a new class of digitally-illiterate citizens. Digital Poverty is a new concept of poverty that refers to the inability to access and benefit from information and communications technology services due to a lack of access to the internet.

In terms of digital literacy, the government has made efforts to improve citizens' digital literacy skills. The National Digital Literacy Mission, the Digital Saksharta Abhiyan, and the Pradhan Mantri Gramin Digital Saksharta Abhiyan are the three main digital literacy programmes that are in the process of implementation. However, these schemes suffer from basic implementation problems due to lack of digital infrastructure and digital penetration. As a result of which there is a wide urban digital gap.

Thus, the need of the hour is to reassess the measures taken and include a more long-term perspective. Long-term initiatives can include the integration of digital literacy programmes with educational curriculums and general literacy programmes. Digital courses can be introduced at a more primary level as also envisioned by the New Education Policy, 2020. Concerning the lack of internet services, global experimentation indicates that success in promoting digital access for remote communities via satellite broadband connectivity should be prioritised. Many start-ups and ventures have also been building in the same context, which includes providing courses at subsidised rates, making connectivity easier, thus a PPP policy can be worked out that ensures that the infrastructure can be provided by the private sector players while implementation is carried out by public authorities.

Thus, it is high time that the government, policy-makers, legislators and civil society push for the integration of digital skills in our existing educational frameworks so that the country doesn't miss out on the economic and social opportunities that this century has to offer.

The Cell has always been an active social media player. It strives to improve our alumni connections and applaud the alumni for the feats they achieve. To achieve this dual goal, regular posts are uploaded on the social media handles of the cell regarding the achievements of our alumni.
