

FROM THE EDITORIAL DESK

The year 2020 witnessed the barriers posed by the pandemic in the form of lockdown orders, social distancing coupled with spiralling health concerns, and skyrocketing anxiety among everyone.

Schools and universities were abruptly closed and students across the world struggled to get back to their homes. Despite these challenges, the education sector emerged as a warrior and stood against all odds, to uphold their goal of imparting knowledge. Amidst the struggle of determining methods of learning beyond the physical boundaries of the classroom, students and teachers found themselves at a juncture where there was a need for paradigm shift in the channels of learning and education.

Symbiosis Law School, Pune in no time adapted itself to the demand of time and successfully conducted online lectures, training and guest lectures through online platforms such as Microsoft Teams, Zoom and Google Meet. Moreover, the mode of lecture delivery also witnessed the paradigms of progress, where a blended learning approach was adopted. In addition to the traditional ways of lecture delivery, the introduction of Small Group Learnings (SGLs) wherein smaller groups of students were encouraged to participate proved to have multi-fold benefits, including clarification of doubts as well as providing for a personalised experience.

In the absence of physical presence, faculties adopted various innovative pedagogies such as video and game-based learning, polling etc to motivate students to participate in the lectures. Such learning methods proved to be an effective intervention towards enhancement of cognitive and behavioural knowledge during online sessions. The virtual experience also expanded the scope for collaborative research and gaining knowledge across various physical barriers.

These challenging times also saw the growth of a significant educational and academic forum in the form of Webinars. The absence of physical constraints magnified academic discourse and diluted the problem of accessibility. These interactive platforms catered to hundreds of students and have become key instruments of education in allowing education and learning to have a vast outreach. In fact, the video-conferencing application, Zoom, saw nearly 300 million daily meeting participants for webinars, office meetings and school classes.

The struggles of COVID-19 were rather used as an opportunity by the education sector to build a unique model for meeting the changing demands of this sector. The model which is flexible, astute and adaptable to the demands of the changing environment to readily combat disruptions in the future.

It is important to remember that despite the hurdles we face with a largely online existence, it is an added responsibility on the students to act wisely and invest their skills towards self-development and progress. While the pandemic shut us from inside, it opened up a whole world without boundaries on our screens, maximizing accessibility. The transition to virtual classroom learning requires students to prepare themselves with the new normal and take this as a chance to hone their capabilities.
